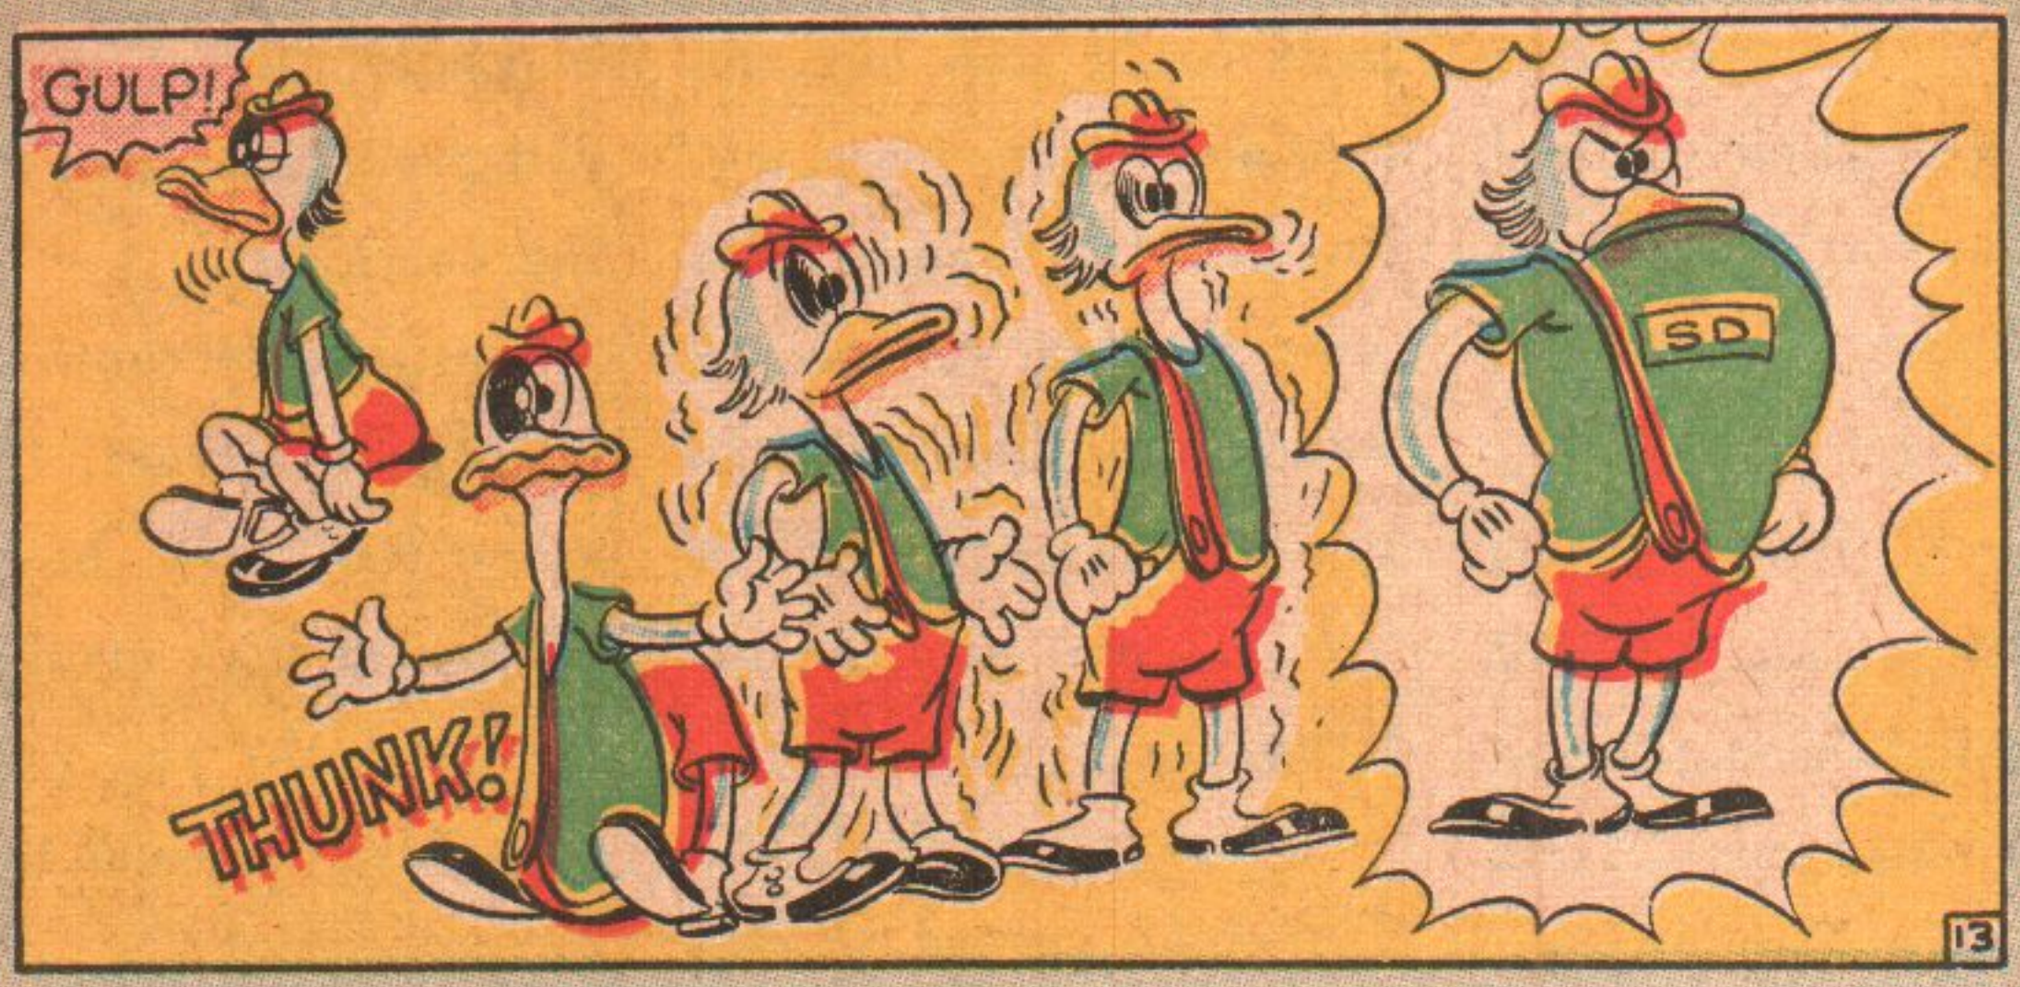
FIREMAN, SAVE MY DUCK!



SUPERDUCK walked into his house beaming, his prized picture under his arm. The first moment he had laid eyes on it at the auction, he knew he had to have it. It was an expensive whim, fifty dollars worth to be exact, but it was well worth it.

"Now let's see. Where's the best place to hang it?" mused Super. "Gotta give it a place of honor."

Super got up on a ladder, with a hammer and nail. He took careful aim, and . . . WHAM! Right on the thumb. An hour later, when he finally took his swollen and aching thumb out of hot water, he went back to the nail and the hammer. This time, he was a lot more careful. He gently nudged the nail into the wall, so that he didn't have to hold it up with his finger.

"Now I got it," Super gloated. "Now I can hit it as hard as I want and not worry. Here goes!" With which, he let fly with all his strength. There was a loud metallic clang, followed by a gush of water which caught him flush in the face and knocked him off the ladder.

"Great Drakes! I punctured the water pipe. I better run down to the cellar and shut off the water valve before the whole house is flooded."

So Super streaked downstairs, grabbed a monkey wrench, and made for the water valve. In his mad haste, he tripped over a can, and a fluid poured out. "Can't bother with that now," he panted. "I gotta get to that valve."

He finally got to it, but when he tried to turn it, it was stuck. "I'll get this !xx&$?!xx thing open if it kills me. Maybe if I brace my feet against the wall, like this . . ." Super gave one great violent yank. The wrench slipped, and sailed over his head, smack into the fuse box. There was the spluttering hiss of a short circuit, and the cellar was plunged into darkness.

"Blankety blank," Super raged. "Everything is happening to me. Now I'll have to light a match and fix that water valve. Then the fuse box. Wonder what that funny smell is in the cellar? . . . Oh, well, here goes." Superduck struck a match. And that was the last he remembered, except for the loud Boom! until he regained consciousness. When he opened his eyes, he was outside his own house, being given artificial respiration by a fireman, and his house was a roaring mass of flames.

"Hmmm . . . I know now what that funny smell was," he mused. "Gasoline fumes." Suddenly, a horrible thought struck him. "The picture," Super gasped. "Gotta save my prize picture." And before anybody could stop him, he tore away from his rescuers, past the firemen who were playing streams of water on the flaming house in a vain effort to stem the fire . . . and into the inferno.

"Great gobs of fire!" the fire chief gasped. "Stop him somebody. The roof will come down any minute. That lunatic'll fry in there."

But there was no stopping Super. He darted through the door, and disappeared in a red haze. It seemed like eternities later when he re-appeared, staggering out the door, his precious picture under his arm. And not a moment too soon. For a split second later, the entire house collapsed, a mass of flaming wreckage.

The fire chief came over, mad as a hornet. "You crazy fool," he howled. "What the heck made you do that? Do you realize how close you came to being roast duck?"

"Sure. But I hadda take the chance," Super grinned triumphantly. "This picture is an original."

"An original of what?"

"The Great Chicago Fire. See?"

"Guess the smoke musta got the chief," said the perspiring firemen as they worked furiously over the pulmotor trying to revive him.
